

The public is best served by diversity in information services and broadcasting platforms, and restricting such diversity is not justified merely because entrenched terrestrial AM and FM broadcasters find themselves threatened by a new source of competition, namely satellite radio. There would be no need for XM's new traffic and weather services, or XM itself, if existing AM and FM broadcasters were doing an adequate job of serving their local audiences. The proper "remedy" is for NAB member broadcasters to improve the quality of their programming and local services, not for restrictions on XM and other satellite radio services.
